

Ebook Directory
the best source of ebook

The book was found

Platoon Leader: A Memoir Of Command In Combat

Synopsis

A remarkable memoir of small-unit leadership and the coming of age of a young soldier in combat in Vietnam."Using a lean style and a sense of pacing drawn from the tautest of novels, McDonough has produced a gripping account of his first command, a U.S. platoon taking part in the 'strategic hamlet' program. . . . Rather than present a potpourri of combat yarns. . . McDonough has focused a seasoned storyteller's eye on the details, people, and incidents that best communicate a visceral feel of command under fire. . . . For the author's honesty and literary craftsmanship, Platoon Leader seems destined to be read for a long time by second lieutenants trying to prepare for the future, veterans trying to remember the past, and civilians trying to understand what the profession of arms is all about. —Army Times

Book Information

Mass Market Paperback: 256 pages

Publisher: Presidio Press; New edition edition (February 4, 2003)

Language: English

ISBN-10: 0891418008

Product Dimensions: 4.2 x 0.6 x 6.9 inches

Shipping Weight: 4 ounces (View shipping rates and policies)

Average Customer Review: 4.7 out of 5 stars 104 customer reviews

Best Sellers Rank: #86,281 in Books (See Top 100 in Books) #8 in Books > History > Military > Life & Institutions #71 in Books > Biographies & Memoirs > Leaders & Notable People > Military > Vietnam War #147 in Books > History > Military > United States > Vietnam War

Customer Reviews

Col. James McDonough, USA (Ret.), graduated from West Point and served in Vietnam as an infantry platoon leader in the legendary 173d Airborne Brigade. A military theorist who has helped shape the post-Cold War army's thinking, he is also the author of The Defense of Hill 781 and The Limits of Glory. Now retired from active duty, McDonough lives with his family in Tallahassee, Florida.

AUGUST 1, 1971: LZ ENGLISH
Slowly the jeep pulls away, and I watch my driver, Phil Nail, trying hard to demonstrate his mastery over the alien vehicle. He has been driving only a few days, and his eyes dart nervously. His new job is a result of my final act of concern for the men of my former rifle platoon. Although Nail is uncomfortable, I am glad I had him transferred. As a rifleman, he was wounded three times. He's been lucky so far, but I know the odds are against his pulling through a fourth wounding. The longer he allows himself to stay in the relative safety of LZ English, the base camp for the 173d Airborne Brigade, the more likely that he will survive to the end of his stay in Vietnam. Having him transferred is the one small gesture I can make before going home, an act I hope will lessen, if only minutely, my feelings of guilt for going home on my feet. How well I know that there are many Phil Nails still out there in the bush. For them I can do nothing. In the hot sun I stand beside the short airstrip of LZ English, waiting for the helicopter to take me to Camranh Bay, where the DC-10 waits to take me home. It is a quiet morning. From my vantage point on the small, leveled hill that houses the airstrip, I can see across the barbed wire fence to the rice paddies and the village of Bong Son beyond. Amid the tall, green rice, Vietnamese peasants are toiling away, here and there a domesticated water buffalo performing the timeless chores of Southeast Asian farming. Smoke wafts up from countless small homes and huts in the crowded village. The smells of Asia drift across the runway, intensified by the warmth of the sun and the stillness of the day. How quiet and serene it seems. Only the sandbagged wooden hut at the edge of the airstrip reminds me that a war is in progress. I am not quite alone. A few yards to my right stands an army major in ill-fitting fatigues. His awkwardness of dress and his soft facial expression tell me at a glance that he has never been on the other side of the barbed wire, out in the field. In the wooden hut a soldier stands beside a field radio; nothing but static hums over the speaker. The soldier's rifle is the only weapon in sight. I ignore them both. I want to be alone with my thoughts. Somehow I must rivet the picture of Bong Son and the countryside into my mind, and I feel I can only do it at this moment. Soon I will be gone, never to see it again. Before, I was too involved, too close to it, to remember it objectively. But now it is important for me to concentrate on these last few minutes on the ground in Binh Dinh province. Perhaps I am assuring myself that I have made it to the end. Perhaps I must convince myself that this is my last day with the 173d Airborne, and I am intact. That seemed a remote possibility when I began leading my platoon back in the early stages of my tour in Vietnam. How long ago was that? Only a year? It seems I was much younger then, so much younger. And the men. Only a few are still around. Perhaps that was why Phil Nail was so smug when he shook my hand and said good-bye. So many of the others are gone. Even their replacements are gone, gone to early graves, hospital wards, shocked and horrified families, and years of questioning what happened, why it happened, and why it happened to them. And how did I make it? Did I ask other men to do what I would not have done? Did I not take care of them? Was I too zealous in doing what was military? Did I contribute to the evil of this war in some callous, uncomprehending way? Or did I lessen that evil by doing what was right, by doing what had to be done, by doing what I was supposed to do? My thoughts are interrupted. The major approaches me and asks me where I am going. I try to conceal my disdain for him, the disdain of a self-acclaimed veteran for the rear area soldier. It is an unfair disdain, but it is there, and he probably sees it. "I'm going home," I tell him. He smiles, trying to share what he expects is my joy. I sense that, and my disdain grows. Doesn't he know that it's not joy? It's confusion; it's guilt; it's a sense of loss--but not joy. There is no room for joy in Vietnam. "I'm a doctor," he tells me. "Psychiatrist, as a matter of fact." I wonder why he tells me that. I become wary. What is a psychiatrist doing here? He makes small talk, but I am only half-listening. Somewhere in his words he asks me my branch (infantry), and where I served in Vietnam. I point to what we call the Tiger Mountains, over in the north. "There," I say, "by the village of Truong Lam, not far from Tam Quon." He looks, but cannot see. He doesn't know the places; he doesn't know what comes with the names. The words mean nothing to him. I suppress my rage at this; many have died in the places that bear those names. "What did you do?" he wants to know. I am wary again. Why is he asking these questions? The answers mean nothing to him. I speak in the past tense of the platoon I led. It has been a while since I led it (having been a staff officer in the last few months of my tour), and the men who were in it then are no longer there. The major picks up my mood; perhaps he is a good psychiatrist after all. "Do you ever dream about it?" he asks me. I am surprised by the question. Dream about it? What does he mean? What is there to dream about? Is he testing a pet theory? Am I a subject of a research effort? "No, I don't dream about it," I tell him, with all the warmth with which I might say, "Shit on you, Bud!" He gets the message and backs off. I stand in silence waiting for the helicopter. The major is the final irony in a year filled with irony. Whoever sets in motion the forces that determine the life we lead has a tremendous flair for the ironic. I marvel at the audacity of the question. My platoon was a part of my life, but I will not dream about it. I am determined I will not.

January, 1974: Medford, Massachusetts

I wake from my sleep with a start. The sweat is damp and chilly on my chest; the sheets cling to me. I sit up, causing my wife to stir in the cool air. Outside the bedroom window I can see a gray morning forming beyond the barren trees that ring the backyard. My heart is beating fast; my nerves feel frayed. The dream was vivid; I feel it lingering even now in the faint morning light. How many were there? Four? Five? No, there were more, and I knew them all. Who were they? Think, think! I knew them. I knew their names. Yes, that's it. They are West Point classmates of mine, all six of them graduates of the Military Academy, class of '69. Momentarily, their names escape me. In the dream they moved so slowly, they talked so solemnly. And their eyes: big, wide, but nothing in them. Glass eyes, looking at me with no expression. They were in full battle dress, each of them, bandoliers strapped across their chests, faces and hands camouflaged, their M-16s taped tightly to avoid metallic clangs. In single file--ranger file, as we called it--they came to me. We knelt in a muddy, barren hole in the ground, an enlarged foxhole or a fresh bomb crater. I'm not sure which. We talked, they and I, but I couldn't remember the words. We were discussing a mission; a map was spread on the ground in front of us, a map marred by mud and rain, barely legible in the dark jungle. When our discussion was over, they stood up to leave. How stiff they looked, how blank their stares. Then I remembered some of the dialogue. "How are you doing?" I had asked them. I wanted to know. I felt as if I had to know. But no one answered. Slowly, again in ranger file, they walked off into the foliage, soundlessly fading into the background of my vision and my dream. By now I knew each of them. Their names, first and last, had come to me. Each one had come with me to Vietnam. Each one had died there. I remembered the psychiatrist, and I cursed him in the quiet of the New England winter morning.

CHAPTER 2 THE ROAD TO WAR

The United States slid into Vietnam so gently, so slowly, it was all but imperceptible to the average observer. The early 1960s had bigger issues to contend with: a missile gap, a space race, a Cuban invasion, confrontation in Berlin, a nuclear face-off with the Soviet Union, an assassinated president, remote wars in faraway places of little importance to the United States, but seeming more important than the nonwars in Indochina. In 1963 a boy coming of age in Brooklyn could identify more easily with the immediate issues of his own life than he could with Buddhist monks immolating themselves in grisly street scenes in Saigon. "Where is Saigon anyway?" he might ask while quickly thumbing through the newspaper to reach the box scores on the latest Yankee thriller against the Red Sox. Sports were important then. Politics were not. Girls were important, too, even if they were more incomprehensible than politics. World affairs are not the stuff of adolescence. School was alleged to be important. All the adults said so. But in Brooklyn, school very often ended with graduation from high school, and that event was looming ever closer as 1963 passed into 1964. A time for decision was fast approaching. If not college, then what kind of work? And if college, then how to pay for it? And where to go? The roads that lead young men to war are not political roads, or national and international roads, but individual roads. What propels young men (and, perhaps in the future, young women) to combat is not the draft. Those who are not destined for armed combat usually will not be drafted for armed combat. The pool of human resources is vast, and the number of riflemen is small. The person who wants to avoid the draft will avoid it. And in Vietnam, as the war went on, the numbers who successfully avoided the draft increased. So who fights? The fools, the uneducated, the knaves? I was none of these--or so I maintain. But I fought. What led me to it? Certainly not the draft. Things were looking up in the winter of 1963-64 as I moved successfully through my senior year in high school. A New York State Regents Scholarship and a part-time evening job were answering the question of how to afford college. Although the thought of enlisting in what appears to be a peacetime army was appealing to an eighteen-year-old yearning to break free of the nest, I was cautioned against running pell-mell into the ranks by my wise father, a veteran of World War II and twenty-two years of enlisted service. The advice made sense, and doubly so since there was a chance for an appointment to West Point. True, it was a remote chance in the highly politicized congressional districts of New York, but some exposure as a promising amateur boxer representing the American Legion gave me hope for a political appointment. At any rate, the army could wait; life was too exciting. By the fall of 1964 Vietnam had become a bigger news item in the local papers. Still, it was too far away, and the United States too little involved, for it to be more than an item of passing interest to a young man planning his future in a world he already knew, a world alien in every way to Southeast Asia. Undergraduate study in civil engineering at Brooklyn Polytechnic allowed me to live at home and commute to college. It also allowed me to continue developing as a boxer in the nearby Brooklyn YMCA. I was expanding my intellectual horizons and feeding my hunger for adventure--right in my own backyard. The summer of 1965 brought talk of sending American units to Vietnam. A year earlier the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution had laid the groundwork for the deployments, but the buildup was still not addressed as a war. It was not of much interest to a college student completing his first undergraduate year and embarking on an interesting summer surveying job in upstate New York. A quirk of fate, however, brought the appointment to West Point. Nobody had qualified from the lower East Side of Manhattan. With a deft push of a pencil I was made an imaginary citizen of Manhattan. The phone call reached me at the surveying camp: "If you can get to West Point in three days, you can enter with the class of 1969. Want it?" A moment of decision. Although young people are never properly prepared for these decisions, they must make them anyway: "I guess so." After all, I had told everybody I was seeking a nomination, and I had literally fought for it. I had taken the tests for it, and I had even been circumcised for it. Having given that much, it didn't seem right to turn it down. I drove down to Staten Island that night. (My family had made the break from Brooklyn.) There was a big family party, a dinner out on the town, a proud ex-NCO father pounding his son the cadet-to-be on the back. I remember his face that night--the map of Ireland looking at me with sparkling blue eyes, pleased as punch that his boy was going to become one of "those goddamned officers." Two days later I drove with my mother to her sister's home thirty miles from West Point. How different my mother's emotions were from my father's. As I left her to continue the last leg of the journey on my own, she became stricken with grief. She was saying good-bye to her boy, her sad dark eyes pouring out tears as she clutched at me with her small hands, her Italian features showing all the hurt a mother feels when she fears for what is about to happen to her son in his quest for his own life. It made me cry, and I was ashamed of it. How could I go to West Point, the school of military leaders, with tears in my eyes? That was a place for men, not mama's boys. Thank God, I had thirty miles for my eyes to unreddden.

I originally got this book as a young officer in the U.S. Air Force because it was highly recommended to me by a long retired Army officer that I worked with, and whose advice I trusted. There are always lists of books that young officers should read, and this one rightfully belongs among those. I firmly believe that what Col. James R. McDonough USA (Ret.) has written about in this short, but powerful book, should be ingrained in the mind of every military officer that has the good fortune and terrible responsibility to command others. The book itself is a quick read, relatively short, but its utterly raw and moving words will stay with you long after you have finished reading them. As the United States finds itself unable to escape the COIN-style wars that Vietnam typified in many ways, the struggles that McDonough encountered as a young platoon leader are struggles that thousands of young men are still encountering today. While this book is only one man's experience in war, it is one that is well worth studying, especially as we continue to ask so much of so few. If you want to get a glimpse into that world, Platoon Leader is a fantastic case study. For a young officer or NCO, I would recommend taking the scenarios in this book, and playing them through in your mind, imagine what your actions might be. McDonough did not always make the right decision, a fact that he refreshingly and honestly acknowledges, but he did what we are all asked to do in such situations - make the best decision we can with limited time and information. This book is wonderfully written, and utterly fascinating, and should definitely be on your bookshelf. If the greatest quality of human beings is the ability to collectively learn, I urge all young officers to read this book, and learn from another young officers successes and mistakes.

This book presented a leaders travail. The pointless war. The trapped indigenous people along with the gore and horror of war. The author invites the reader to be part of his men seeing their unique attributes and sometimes quick end of life or permanent disfigurement. This is a thoughtful book of a platoon leaders time in Vietnam.

I had read this book few years back before Kindle and a few years after I returned from Vietnam where I too had been a platoon leader but up in I Corp. At that time the book had not made a very good impression because Vietnam was still too fresh in my mind. But when I ordered it and re-read Platoon Leader I realized how very accurate and explicit the author portrayed the responsibilities and dangers that a Platoon leader could expect to experience during his tour of combat duty. That is not to say any other platoon leader experienced the same situation or conditions. This is absolutely his story and the experiences are unique to McDonough. But because of the honest and humble style the author uses to bring to life his story it leaves no doubt he has "been there and done that."

Platoon Leader details McDonough's time in Vietnam commanding an undermanned platoon assigned to protecting a village in the Strategic Hamlet program. The book highlights the extreme nature of Vietnam inasmuch as long periods of boredom torn apart by extreme moments of violence and carnage. From the outset McDonough's platoon was undermanned, undersupplied and in need of a strong commander to pull things together. He recounts his night long conversation with the outgoing Platoon Commander who preferred to stay in the perimeter and just hope the "sh*t" didn't hit the fan. McDonough chose to beef up patrols and actively deny the enemy chance to mass and attack. Two completely different types of leadership. McDonough's writing is straightforward and succinct. He tells us the decisions he makes and why he makes them. He comes across as squared away but he also admits his faults. He recounts a night patrol where whispers could be heard to his patrol's front. Ready to sneak up and destroy the source of the whispers McDonough is asked by one of his men to "hold up" while the man crawls forward and checks things out. The source of the whispers, it turns out, is a family from the village that chose the safety of a hole outside the village as opposed to the harassment of the VC inside the village. McDonough struggles with what could have happened. Here he exposes his human side and questions his own character. He tells us about a complex signal system the villagers, including monks, used to warn the VC when one of McDonough's patrols has left the perimeter. The villagers would put a light in a window strategically marking the direction of the patrol, the monks would ring bells, someone would whistle and all this added up to the direction, strength and speed of movement of McDonough's patrol. The VC would use this information to either avoid, engage or ambush the patrol. Fascinating stuff that, along with booby traps and sniper fire was just another day in Vietnam protecting people who seemingly didn't want you there. Platoon Leader is a wonderful book that could serve as somewhat of a text book in Command and Control of men in combat. I thoroughly enjoyed it and would recommend it.

"Platoon Leader" by James R. McDonough is a dramatic and believable actual account of what a platoon leader in the infantry must do with and for his troops in combat. It is obvious that McDonough actually lived this experience. Anyone who experienced combat in Vietnam will immediately acknowledge the reality of which McDonough writes. The descriptions of some actions will bring back some very uncomfortable episodes in one of the most memorable years of our lives! The very best book ever in describing that war which is just now becoming somewhat appreciated after so many years.

This is an excellent book about an Army Infantry Lieutenant's time in Vietnam. He is a good writer and story teller. Furthermore, he gives the reader very good lessons on leadership. This book is excellent for any junior military officer, a police sergeant or lieutenant, or anyone who is charged with leading a small group of people.

Download to continue reading...

Platoon Leader: A Memoir of Command in Combat Blood Clot: In Combat with the Patrols Platoon, 3 Para, Afghanistan 2006 The Leader Phrase Book: 3000+ Powerful Phrases That Put You In Command Act Like a Leader, Think Like a Leader Knife Fighting, Knife Throwing for Combat (Special Forces/Ranger-Udt/Seal Hand-To-Hand Combat/Special W) Once a Warrior--Always a Warrior: Navigating The Transition From Combat To Home--Including Combat Stress, Ptsd, And Mtbi Aerial Combat Escapades: A Pilot's Logbook: The True Combat Aerial Adventures of an American Fighter Pilot Combat Headaches: A chiropractor's advice for those who suffer from migraines, jaw pain, sinus pain and/or tension headaches (Combat Dis-Ease) (Volume 2) Army Techniques Publication ATP 3-21.8 Infantry Platoon and Squad April 2016 Red Platoon: A True Story of American Valor Outlaw Platoon: Heroes, Renegades, Infidels, and the Brotherhood of War in Afghanistan Black Hearts: One Platoon's Descent into Madness in Iraq's Triangle of Death Joker One: A Marine Platoon's Story of Courage, Leadership, and Brotherhood Red Platoon One Million Steps: A Marine Platoon at War Cold Noses, Brave Hearts: Dogs and Men of the 26th Infantry Scout Dog Platoon The Longest Winter: The Battle of the Bulge and the Epic Story of WWII's Most Decorated Platoon The Longest Winter: The Battle of the Bulge and the Epic Story of World War II's Most Decorated Platoon Armor Attacks: The Tank Platoon - An Interactive Exercise in Small-Unit Tactics and Leadership In Deadly Combat: A German Soldier's Memoir of the Eastern Front

Contact Us

DMCA

Privacy

FAQ & Help