Architexts: Volume 4

Synopsis

Just because it is a new year, doesn't mean it is going to be any different than the last. Actually, it is more of that same at Franklin + Newbury Architects. Not only does the CAD software crash, but the BIM software does, too. RFPs with "not to exceed" project fees that barely cover the schematic design phase are the norm. Timesheets still need to be filled out, and contractors continue to go out of their way to create problems. These are the (mostly) true stories about working in an architectural firm. This collection includes all of all the comics from the fourth year of Architexts and some bonus material.

JOKER has a B.S. in Architecture and works full time as an architectural designer. He is still on his open-ended sabbatical from finishing his Master's Degree, and still has little desire to pursue taking the AREs. Joker has worked in several firms since the start of his career, and has always been underpaid. He lives at an undisclosed location with his family. MAVERICK is a Registered Architect with a Master of Architecture degree. Maverick has been working for small architectural firms for his entire career. Maverick is now a member of the AIA (at his firm's expense, of course), and is still trying to figure out what difference it makes. In the little spare time he has, Maverick enjoys reading and sketching--mostly subjects that don't include architecture.
